

UNION LEADER ADMITS BURNING HIS RECORDS

Prosecutor Charges That Smith
Caused Cleveland Reign of Terror.

THUGS NOT PUNISHED
One Defendant, Testifying for Himself, Contradicts Post Office Receipt.

INDIANAPOLIS, Dec. 14.—The reign of terror in Cleveland after the strike order against the American Bridge Company in 1905, which continued until McNamara's arrest, was brought out prominently in the dynamiting trial today. The witnesses called by the defense all denied any connection with the riots or knowledge of the fifteen explosions in the jurisdiction of Peter J. Smith, who was the State business agent of the ironworkers.

Smith, a defendant, was on the stand, and in direct examination denied the statements of sixteen different witnesses with respect to riots, assaults and conferences in which they said he figured during the labor troubles in Cleveland. According to his testimony, his attitude was peaceful and always conciliatory, but he was arrested on several occasions and assaulted on many others.

Following the dynamiting of the work of the American Bridge Company, Smith said, he caused the arrest of an employee of the company as a result of an investigation, which convinced him that the man, named Claypool, had set off the explosion, but nothing came of the prosecution. Claypool, he said, was boarding at the Frankfort Hotel when the explosion occurred there in March, preceding the bridge explosion in December, 1906.

On cross-examination the District Attorney brought out the facts that the witness had served both as president and as secretary of his local since 1905; that in this time there were fifteen explosions in Cleveland; that money had been contributed by the local for the defense of a man charged with assault and battery with intent to kill; that the strike against the American Bridge Company was called in 1905, and the explosions began in 1906 and continued with increasing frequency till McNamara's arrest, and that in three years the Cleveland local received from the International the sum of $1,866.

Smith said he had no record of his actions from day to day, as he had ordered his housekeeper to burn them. This was on the morning that he left Cleveland to come here for trial. He said these records showed where he had been day after day for several years. Pressed for a reason for destroying them, the witness replied that they were of no further use.

Smith denied saying to the manager of the Peckless Automobile Company, "If necessary I'll send every open shop man to hell." He admitted that he had followed non-union men after they quit work, getting on a street car with them. He had ten or twelve union men with him and there was a fight, in which several were hurt.

When the defense tried to prove that Smith had not been arrested Judge Anderson stopped the witness with the remark that action or non-action by local courts made no difference when it was in evidence that explosions had been going on for years throughout the country, and Mr. Miller said: "The evidence has shown that for years there was a reign of terror in Cleveland second only to that in Los Angeles. The evidence shows that this man, Peter Smith, was active in creating this terrorism and was in many instances a leader of the gang that assaulted non-union men. The Government has shown that in nearly all these instances the guilty men were not punished."

George Andrews of Cleveland, also a defendant, was on the stand and denied all that the witnesses for the Government said about him. Asked about a special delivery package delivered at the house of Mrs. Smith on July 4, 1910, he said there was no special delivery package delivered at about that time. He said Mrs. Anna Smith was the only Mrs. Smith at the house, and that she could write her name, and that she did not use the name Mrs. P. J. Smith, as her husband's name had been Bernard Smith.

This was contrary to the post office records in Cleveland, which show that a special delivery package had been delivered at the home of P. J. Smith in Cleveland, and the receipt was signed "Mrs. P. J. Smith, her mark." An employee of the Cleveland post office had testified to the delivery of this package to a woman at the house, who had said she could not write. McNamara testified that he sent the fuse for the Akron explosion to Smith in this special delivery package.

SAYS POLICE LIFE SPOILED HIM.

Woman Dates Troubles to Husband's Appointment to Force.

Mrs. Adeline L. Schaffer yesterday asked Supreme Court Justice Page for alimony pending a suit for divorce from Paul L. Schaffer, a policeman, and told the court that all her troubles began when her husband got on the force. She lived happily with him until he became a policeman ten years ago, she said, and since then he has been neither "decent nor humane to his family."

Mrs. Schaffer alleged that when anything went wrong on her husband's post he came home and abused his family. Among the things she said he did were the following: Tried to strike her father, aged 86; chased her out on the fire escape; knocked her down three times; kicked her twice, threatened to kill her and she defended herself with a hatchet; threw a plate of spaghetti and cabbage at her.

Schaffer denied all his wife's allegations of cruelty and said he wanted her to continue to live with him. He will support her as luxuriously as his position allows, he says.

Justice Page decided that Mrs. Schaffer must submit evidence to corroborate her statements before she could have alimony.

BOOKS at Macy Savings

Macy's is still successfully fighting the Book Trust, and in spite of the difficulty of obtaining the Books sells the fiction of the day at a saving to you of 10%.

The savings on standard authors and fine library sets are far greater—and they are greatest (from ¼ to 1-3) on high-class imported merchandise where Macy's facilities in obtaining it are equal to or greater than is the case with other stores.

"Some books are to be tasted—others to be swallowed"—and some few to be chewed and digested."
